- Non-communicable Diseases, Affluence and Gender, By – Pratima Yadav and Et.al.,

ABSTRACT

Whether the burden of non-communicable diseases has shifted to older men and women, and whether it varies by marital status and affluence of the household has been examined. The analysis is based on the 60th and 71st rounds of the National Sample Survey for 2004 and 2014. Even though comparisons of prevalence and shares between men and women are relied on in the analysis, some glaring disparities emerge. The growing menace of NCDs in the context of a rapidly increasing older population calls for bold policy initiatives, which are currently either underfunded or limited in coverage and uncoordinated. A drastic overhaul of the health system and behavioural changes are thus emphasised.

- Education, Employment and Economic Growth with Special Reference to Females in Kerala, Written by – Ruchi Balla & Surendra Meher

ABSTRACT

Human development is considered to be the ultimate objective of development, with economic growth as a means to achieve it (Ranis et al. in World Dev 28(2):197–219, 2001). Development stands to be justified when it is equipped with good employment opportunities. Employment provides the means for meeting the income and subsistence needs of the individuals and their families, which fulfils the goal of overall and equitable development (Mathew in Int Labour Rev 154:497–518, 2015). Employment levels would rise when there is sufficient and efficient human capital. Human capital establishes an interconnection between employment and development.

- Wage Differentials Among Workers : An Empirical Analysis of the Manufacturing and Service Sectors, Written by – Sonu Madan

ABSTRACT

The paper examines the existence of wage differentials and attempts to enquire into the factors determining such differentials in the manufacturing and service sectors of Haryana state. It highlights the relative importance of worker-specific factors and firm-specific factors in explaining wage differentials in the labour market using a semi-logarithmic regression model. Worker-specific factors such as education, work experience, gender and marital status explain around half of the variation in the wage level of workers, whereas firm-specific factors such as nature, size, type and location of the enterprise are able to explain only a small proportion of variation in the wage level, ranging from 17% in the manufacturing sector to 12% in the service sector.

- Migrants and Informal Casual Labour Markets, By – Errol D'Souza

ABSTRACT

Many regions implicitly differentially prioritize the interests of local residents and of migrants whilst filling vacant jobs resulting in a trade-off between welfare rights and openness to migration. Migrants take into account the trade-offs of poor working conditions and unwritten and unenforceable contracts, with the higher income in the destination region, and all considered migrate. We provide a framework for understanding this socio-economic outcome. Many migrants are low-skilled workers in the informal sector where the requirements for complete contracting are severe.

- Short-Term Migration and Children's School Attendance : Evidence from Rural India, BY – Leena Bhattacharya

ABSTRACT

Every year, millions of individuals from rural India migrate internally for short periods in search of employment. Temporary migration of parents can affect school attendance of children from these families. This study uses data from National Sample Survey Organisation's (NSSO) Situation Assessment Survey 2013 to examine whether having a short-term migrant member in the family affects school attendance of children aged 6–10 years in rural India. An estimate from logit regression suggests that controlling for individual and family characteristics, village, district controls and NSSO state-region fixed effects, being from a migrant family reduces the probability that a child aged 6–10 years attends school by 15%.
